In the Eastern DRC, high schools struggle with the international university application process due to a lack of knowledge among teachers. The workshop, led by Arnold in Goma, equipped educators with skills to support students applying to international universities, addressing issues like scams and fees. The project achieved significant success, empowering teachers from eight high schools and suggesting future expansion, better computer access, and further training to enhance educational support. This initiative has considerably impacted teachers' ability to guide students through the university application process, benefiting the broader community.
